

A 3-part online series to help you Lead Stronger at Three Levels

Leadership has changed in the last few decades. Today's leaders can no longer rely on "command and control" strategies to move their organizations along. Instead, they must develop the skill to "connect and collaborate." Leadership today requires the act of influence, especially when working virtually.

How do you develop the skills of connection, collaboration, and influence in order to inspire your team, advance your organization, contribute to society, and be the sort of leader people want to follow?

Prairie State Conservation Coalition, in partnership with Benedictine University's Center for Values-Driven Leadership, has designed a 3-part online series to enable busy leaders to benefit from a time of focused leadership development. During our workshops, we'll consider what it means to lead at three levels: self, others, and organization.

Commitment: Participants commit to attending all sessions & engaging in approximately 1-hour of pre- and post-work per session. Each participant will receive a digital workbook with session materials and links to additional resources.

Leading Self: Being a Leader People Want to Follow

Before you can lead others, you have to lead yourself; this session will invite participants to identify their personal values and consider the characteristics they most admire in other leaders, then connect those concepts to their daily leadership opportunities.

Sept. 17 • 9-10:30 am

Leading Others: Building High-Performing Teams

Research has identified common characteristics of high-performing teams. This session will share principles of high-performance, and practices that can help team members connect with one another and reach new levels of performance.

Oct. 1 • 9-10:30 am

Leading the Org: Connecting Purpose to Strategy to Drive Results

Successful leaders align organizational purpose to strategy, and then build culture and systems to support their purpose and strategy. In this session, participants will explore these concepts and then learn a tool for identifying strategy through collaboration.
